

Sociology of Diversity

Series Editor: David G. Embrick, University of Connecticut, US

This fast-growing series brings together the highest quality sociological and interdisciplinary research that critically engages with the topic of diversity, including, but not limited to, ethnic, racial, gender and sexualities diversity.

Currently, diversity as a concept tends to be non-critical and excessively broad in interpretation. In contrast, this international series is specific in scope to empirical and theoretical research that engages in a critical examination and analysis of diversity, inclusion and equity. As such, it is particularly interested in sociological and interdisciplinary scholarship that offers new empirical, theoretical or epistemological insights that interrogate how the language of diversity has been used to hide, minimize or deflect real issues of inequality in society(ies).
