Spaces of Peace, Security and Development

Series Editors: John Heathershaw, University of Exeter, UK, Shahar Hameiri, University of Queensland, Australia, Jana Hönke, University of Bayreuth, Germany and Sara Koopman, Kent State University, US

Peace, security and development are normative goods and empirical domains which are connected in theory and practice. The concept of space links these domains and is increasingly utilised in their study across a range of disciplines. This is due to the growing recognition that processes of peace, security and development do not neatly correspond to a territorialised demarcation of the world into nation-states.

This series provides an interdisciplinary home for spatially based studies from scholars from a range of backgrounds, but in particular those who engage with one or more of: Area Studies, International Relations, Human Geography and Political Anthropology.

Call for proposals

The series publishes research that moves away from purely abstract debates about concepts and focuses instead on fieldwork-based studies of specific places and peoples. It shows how particular spatial histories and geographic configurations can foster or hinder peace, security and development. It also encourages work that takes account of the new spatialities of conflict and charts the transnational practices of peace, security and development.

The series welcomes research monographs that empirically or interpretatively test theoretical propositions, as well as edited collections that debate key theoretical, methodological and ethical questions.
