Observing Organizations

Series Editors: Mike Rowe, University of Liverpool and Matthew Brannan, University of Newcastle

Organizational ethnography is concerned with contemporary organizations, with the way things are done and with the ways in which people interact with each other, with social structures and with technologies. It is both methodology, often associated with a pragmatist or critical realist concern to reveal and describe complexities rather than simple causal relationships, and method, classically concerned with close observation (whether participant, non-participant or covert) over time. Yet it is also a creative endeavour, which lends itself to experimentation and playfulness, a written work that emerges from and through our research.

This series will publish interdisciplinary books that employ observation to explore organizations. This is a deliberately broad scope because the series is open to the broadest understandings of both what constitutes ethnography (though note the emphasis on close observation over time) and what forms organising takes. We will consider autoethnographies, visual and sensory ethnographies, netnographies and all manner of other innovations in ethnographic work.

We particularly welcome manuscripts that seek to play with the style of presentation and with the conventions of publishing in order to convey something of the world they describe.

Call for book proposals

Books in the series will typically be between 60,000 – 90,000 words in length. Research monographs will be the preferred format. Edited volumes will be considered where there is a clear rationale for the proposal and evidence of the quality of the individual contributions. Topics might include:

- Changing forms of organization and working practices
- Alternative organizations and communities
- Contemporary work and employment
- Culture in contemporary organizations
- Gender, ethnicity, disability and sexuality in organizational life
- Organizations in a changing environment and climate
- Power, resistance and obedience in the workplace
- Emotional labour
- AI and other technologies in the contemporary workplace
- Public organizations
- Private organizations
- Third sector organizations
- Visual and sensory ethnographies
- Autoethnographies
- Netnographies
- Ethics in organizational ethnography

Manuscripts will be sought from scholars in a range of academic fields in addition to management and business studies including, anthropology, politics, sociology, social policy, philosophy, development and community studies and cultural, communication and media studies.
